THE WOMAN IN BLACK

BY SUSAN HILL AND STEPHEN MALLATRATT

WELCOME

When I first saw THE WOMAN IN BLACK in its debut west end run over 30 years ago, I remember the curious sensation of being terrified in a theatre. I was used to being scared in a cinema and at home watching the late-night horror on television - but in a theatre? It was an experience I had not had before (or since).

I think one of the reasons for the scare factor in THE WOMAN IN BLACK is that it is so well written. Stephen Mallatratt's very clever adaptation of the classic modern novel by Susan Hill, takes you elegantly into the old spooky house ghost story, while giving the play its own theatrical slant. All the scares and jumps in the dark come beautifully from story and words as we invest in the atmosphere of Eel Marsh House.

A huge part of the world of THE WOMAN IN BLACK is this atmosphere and I am so grateful to this wonderful team of creatives for their care and attention to detail, bringing an empty stage to ghostly life. Also, I am so blessed with this superb cast, Garth Holcombe and Jamie Oxenbould, who take the words and make them real. Directing THE WOMAN IN BLACK has been a long time coming and with this great creative team, it has been well worth the wait.

Enjoy, if that's the right word... and let the nightmares begin.

SYNOPSIS

Mr Kipps is troubled by disturbing memories of his journey to fog bound Eel Marsh, where Mrs Drablow's lonely house stands in isolation. Trapped by the fog, he witnessed mysterious events he would rather forget, but cannot. In desperation, he enlists the help of an actor to tell his tale and exorcise the demons that haunt his dreams. As the two men become immersed in Kipps' story, eerie events materialise from the mists of the past and begin to haunt the present.
